

Simon Crane has just been served a restraining order from the person he loves the most in the world. After a night of drunken brawling in which he may or may not have assaulted a police officer, the 45-year-old offender finds himself attending group therapy and writing a journal about the things he's done. He's the son of an abuser, and it looks like that abuse has surfaced within himself. The question is, can Simon recognize what he's done? More importantly, can he change?
